Introduction

- - - - -

¶1. (C) Pakistan's security forces continued to capture key locations in Swat during the fourth week of May. However, continuing last week's trend, the Taliban struck back by targeting security forces and civilians in four mass-casualty bombing attacks in Peshawar and one in Dera Ismail Khan, besides the high-profile bombing in Lahore (outside the scope of this cable) on May 27. Fighting cooled in Buner and Lower Dir, where only a few local engagements occurred and government officials invited residents to return to their homes. In the South Waziristan Agency (SWA), tit-for-tat fighting escalated as reinforced Pakistani military forces bombarded Baitullah Mehsud's fighters.

¶2. (SBU) Militants continued to attack policemen in Peshawar, Swat, Kohat, Haripur, Tank, and Dera Ismail Khan. One newspaper report claimed the militants paid a bounty ($250) for the murder of police.

¶3. (C) Particularly in the areas around Swat and east of SWA, the Pakistani government stepped up its mobilization of local communities against taliban elements, calling jirgas and leaning on them to form lashkars and to turn over fleeing militants. The government's increased community organizing activity this week may in part be a reaction to last week's resistance by the local community in Kalam (Upper Swat) to fleeing militants (ref E); while the resulting engagements between lashkars and militants in this area were relatively minor, the Pakistani government was able to exploit them extensively in the press.

¶4. (SBU) The Pakistani government and military more generally ramped up their public relations drive against the militants over the week, allowing reporters into some of the secured areas of Swat and displaying captured facilities and militants. An emaciated 14-year-old boy, Muhammad Akhtar, rescued on May 22 by security forces at Baini Baba Ziarat, Shangla, was presented to the media and described how the Taliban had recruited him and dozens of other teenage boys by force and used the site as a terrorist training center.
